We found the license info for Googles' Blockly. Blockly uses the Apache License 2.0 which states that we are free to use, modify blockly for our use without concern for royalties.

We have also found a library called EasyJ, an extension of Blockly made at Old Town High School, Maine. This library has the ability to turn blocks into java code. I have spent this week trying to get this library to work for our purpose but this is proving difficult.